

Emerald Contractors Becomes Certified Green Professional Builder

PALM HARBOR, Fla. (January, 2009) – John Marzulli, owner of Emerald Contractors, has received his Certified Green Professional Designation (CGP) from the National Association of Home Builders (NAHB). This special designation is in recognition of his high degree of professional competence in the area of green remodeling.

In order to achieve this certification, builders must participate in rigorous training sessions covering topics such as how green homes provide buyers with lower energy costs and higher value as well as strategies for incorporating green-building principles into homes without increasing the cost of construction.

MSNBC recently noted that although the desire for green building is increasing, there are still few contractors who truly understand where to begin. Emerald Contractors is proud to be one of the few to now offer this certified expertise. “The increasing trend toward green remodeling has been international in scope and quite dramatic over the past decade,” comments John Marzulli. “Staying current with the increasing advantages and technologies associated with this will undeniably help me offer fresh new ideas and ultimately a better product to my clients.” Energy-efficient appliances, solar energy, reused building materials and chemical-free materials are a few of the options that Emerald Contractors now educate clients about.
